The Two Glasses.

At the temperance meeting, last Wednesday evening, the following verses were repeated by Mr. H. G. McCormick, and the meeting requested their publication, with which request we cheerfully comply:

There sat two glasses, filled to the brim,

On a rich man's table, rim to rim.

One was ruddy, and red as blood,

And one was clear as the crystal flood.

Said the glass of rum to his paler brother,

"Let us tell tales of the past to each other:

I can tell of banquet and revel, and mirth,

Where I was king, for I ruled in mirth.

And the proudest and gratest souls on earth

Fell under my touch, as though struck with lightning.

From the heads of kings I have torn the crown,

From the heights of fame I have hurled men down.

I have blasted many an honored name, I have taken virtue, and given shame;

I have tempted the youth, with a sip, a taste,

That has made his future a barren waste.

Far greater than any king am I, Or than any army beneath the sky.

I have made the arm of the driver fall, I have made the heart of the warrior fail.

I have made good ships go down at sea, And the shrieks of the lost were sweet to me;

For they said, "Behold, how great you are!"

Fame, strength, wealth, genius, before you fall.

And your might and power are over all."

"Ho! ho! pale brother," laughed the rum,

"Can you boast of deeds as great as mine?"

Said the water glass, "I can not boast

Of a king dethroned or a murdered host;

But I can tell of hearts that were set free,

By my crystal drops made light and glad.

Of thirst I have quenched, and brows I've lavied;

Of hands I have cooled, and souls I've saved.

I have leaped through the valley, dashed down the mountain;

Slept in the sunshine, and dripped from the fountain.

I have burst my cloud fetters, and dropped from the sky,

And everywhere gladdened the landscape and eye.

I have eased the hot forehead of fever and pain,

I have made the parched meadows grow fertile with grain;

I can tell of the powerful wheel of the mill,

That ground out the flour, and turned at my will;

I can tell of manhood, debased by you, That I have uplifted, and crowned anew.

I cheer, I help, I strengthen and aid, I gladden the heart of man and maid;

I set the chained rum captive free, And all are better for knowing me."

One hundred thousand men, Gay youth and silver head,

On every hill, and every plain, In palace, cot and lonely den,

Each year from rum he dead.

On many a woodland plain their glittering lives go round,

Homes for their loved ones' dear gain,

They filled the soil; they ploughed the main.

They taught with pen and tongue; Our brothers lived by their side;

They tasted, fell and sadly died From rum, good friends, from rum.

One hundred thousand hearts are rendered desolate,

And must be for ever torn, Must children's children feel the curse,

Friends shall we now awake, And with a loud voice the nation shake,

And cry, away with rum!

These are the tales they told each other,

The glass of rum and his paler brother,

As they sat together in perfect health, On the rich man's table, rim to rim.

THE SECRET CLOSET.

"For murder, though it hath no tongue, will speak with most miraculous organ."

In the year 1813—John Smith (I use fictitious names) was indicted for the wilful murder of Henry Thompson.

The case was one of the most extraordinary nature, and the interest excited by it was almost unparalleled.

The accused was a man of considerable property, residing upon his own estate. A person, supposed to be an entire stranger to him, had, late in a summer day, requested and obtained shelter and hospitality for the night. He had, it was supposed, retired to bed in perfect health, requesting to be awakened at an early hour the following morning. When the servant appointed to call him entered his room for that purpose, he was found in his bed perfectly dead; and from the appearance of the body it was obvious that he had been so for many hours. There was not the slightest mark of violence upon his person, and the countenance retained the same expression it had borne during life.

Days and weeks passed on, and little further was discovered. In the meantime rumor had not been idle. Suspicions were vague, indeed, and undefined, and were at first whispered, and afterward boldly expressed. The precise object of these suspicions was not clearly indicated; some implicated one person, some another; but they all pointed to Smith, the master of the house, as concerned in the death of the stranger; and in due time the magistrates were induced to commit Mr. Smith to jail to take his trial for the wilful murder of Henry Thompson. As it was deemed essential to the attainment of justice to keep secret the examination of the witnesses who were produced before the magistrates, all the information of which the public were in possession before the trial took place was placed in a room at the back of the court house, and the public were not allowed to enter it until the morning of trial.

The counsel for the prosecution opened his case to the jury in a manner that indicated very little expectation of a conviction. He began by imploring them to divert their minds from all that they had heard before they came into the box; he entreated them to attend to the evidence and judge from that alone.

It would be proved beyond the possibility of a doubt that the deceased died by poison—poison of a most subtle nature, most active in its operation, and possessing the wonderful and dreadful quality of leaving no external mark
